

Robert Born, Barbara Kristina Murovec (Eds.)

Visual Memory and Oblivion

Monuments and Conflicts in Urban Spaces in Central and Eastern Europe from the Nineteenth Century to the Present Day

Das östliche Europa: Kunst- und Kulturgeschichte

Herausgegeben von

Robert Born, Michaela Marek †, Ada Raev

Band 17

Barbara Kristina Murovec, Robert Born (Eds.)

VISUAL MEMORY AND OBLIVION

Monuments and Conflicts in Urban Spaces
in Central and Eastern Europe from the Nineteenth Century to the Present Day

In Collaboration with Wolfgang Augustyn

BÖHLAU

The publication was supported by the Zentralinstitut für Kunstgeschichte in Munich.

ISBN 978-3-412-52908-6

ISBN 978-3-412-52910-9 (PDF)

ISBN 978-3-412-52909-3 (eLibrary)

DOI <https://doi.org/10.7788/9783412529109>

Bibliographic information published by the Deutsche Nationalbibliothek

The Deutsche Nationalbibliothek lists this publication in the Deutsche Nationalbibliografie; detailed bibliographic data are available on the Internet at <https://dnb.dnb.de>.

© 2026 Brill Deutschland GmbH, Robert-Bosch-Breite 10, 37079 Göttingen, Germany

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, translated, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, without prior written permission from the publisher. Text and datamining for commercial purposes requires the publisher's permission.

Böhlau and Brill Deutschland GmbH are part of De Gruyter Brill
www.degruyterbrill.com

Questions about General Product Safety Regulation: productsafety@degruyterbrill.com

Cover photo: Dirk Suckow, Halle

Cover design: Michael Haderer, Wien

Typesetting: büro mn, Bielefeld

Printing: Prime Rate, Budapest

Table of Contents

Barbara Kristina Murovec/Robert Born THE VISUAL POLITICS AND PUBLIC MONUMENTS OF CITIES Introduction	7
Daria Brasca/Donata Levi CONFLICTING MEMORIES IN TRIESTE The Case of the Holocaust Memorials	21
Svetlana Smolčić Makuljević JEWISH HERITAGE IN BITOLA BETWEEN MEMORY AND OBLIVION	61
Dragan Damjanović THE STATE, THE OPPOSITION AND THE COMMEMORATION OF THE NATIONAL PAST Public Monuments in Croatia in the Late Nineteenth and Early Twentieth Centuries	93
Patricia Počanić PUBLIC ART FOR A NEW SOCIALIST CITY Monuments, Sculptures and Temporary Interventions in Novi Zagreb	126
Milan Popadić NEW BELGRADE'S UŠĆE From No-Man's Land to (Not So) Public Space	163
Barbara Kristina Murovec/Helena Rožman FORGETTING THE UNWANTED PAST BY VISUALISING A NEW LOCAL IDENTITY Public Monuments in Krško	183
Iain Boyd Whyte BERLIN: REICHSKANZLERPLATZ – ADOLF-HITLER-PLATZ – BENITO-MUSSOLINI-PLATZ – REICHSKANZLERPLATZ (AGAIN) – THEODOR-HEUSS-PLATZ The Story is in the Names	220

Anke Schlecht
“AUF WIEDERSEHEN”
Two Fountains for the Nuremberg Hauptmarkt and the Ongoing Transformations of Public Space	240
Tanja Zimmermann
FEUILLETON AND KINETIC PERCEPTION OF SAINT PETERSBURG IN THE EARLY NINETEENTH CENTURY
A Stroll Along Nevsky Prospect and Its Places of Remembrance	278
Irene Giviashvili
THE CULT OF STALIN AND THE REMODELLING OF GORI	304
Giovanni Rubino
ODE TO LABOUR AND THE WORKING CLASS
Dino Basaldella’s Ear of Ravne	328
Nenad Makuljević
AUTOCRACY AND URBAN IDENTITY
The Monument to Stefan Nemanja in Belgrade	356
Dirk Suckow
SOMEWHERE UNDER THE RAINBOW OR THE CONSTRUCTED POLITICS OF HISTORY
The Peoples’ Friendship Monument in Kyiv	375
CONTRIBUTORS	400

The Visual Politics and Public Monuments of Cities

Introduction

Adopting an art-historical approach, the present volume explores the interplay between two areas of research – cities and memory – within the broader context of the visual politics of public spaces, as shaped, constrained or forbidden by municipal or state institutions and actors. Whilst each of these two fields has been comprehensively addressed in recent decades,¹ there are comparatively few studies that synthesise these aspects and concepts from an art-historical perspective with a focus on the regions covered in this volume. A central tenet of our volume is the assertion that public monuments, through their erection, preservation, transformation, erasure or destruction,² serve as avenues for political and artistic interpretation of the past and thereby circumvent the objective of providing an accurate historical account. However, the multidirectional memory of the (former) inhabitants is rarely incorporated into urban spaces either in a convincing or fair manner.³ The artistic style of public monuments plays a crucial role; it is promoted by established art criticism and orchestrated for political purposes. The interplay between artistic and political perspectives in public spaces has a long history, which became particularly apparent in the second half of the nineteenth century and in the post-Second World War decades. During the Cold War, the monumental landscape theoretically mirrored the division of the world into blocs.⁴ As evidenced by the articles in this edited volume, contemporary commissioning policy continues to be profoundly influenced by the interplay between art and the humanities, on the one hand, and authoritarian and autocratic power, on the other. Capital cities and locations of strategic importance, including border regions, are considered to be spaces in which visual politics receive particular emphasis and are conveyed as an unambiguous narrative. Notwithstanding the political function of public monuments, however, even within closed art systems, there are differences and artistic deviations stemming from individual creativity. These may emerge from a fascination with the regime, ideological disobedience, the artistic abstraction of the personal pursuit of truth, or, for example, the aspiration to achieve universality or even eternity in artistic expression.

1 E. g. ASSMANN 1999. – ECKARDT 2014. – MIEG/HEYL 2013. – PAKIER/WAWRZYNIAK 2015. – NERDINGER 2017. – KOGLER/HAMEDINGER 2021. – KOGLER/HAMEDINGER 2024.

2 Cf. e. g. YOUNG 1992. – THAMER 1997. – GAMBONI 2018.

3 For the concept of multidirectional memory, cf. ROTHBERG 2009.

4 Cf. e. g. DRENGENBERG 1972. – MITTIG 1972. – BOWLT 1978. – RAUSCH 2006. – SAUNDERS 2018.

Studies of monuments from periods of dictatorship,⁵ both past and present, reveal striking similarities in the strategies of visual politics throughout Europe during the nineteenth, twentieth and twenty-first centuries, when viewed from a longue durée perspective. Most notably, the profound influence of the prevailing politics and ideology of the era on the visual and spatial agenda within individual countries and cities is evident. The concept of lieux de mémoire, as theorised by Pierre Nora (1931–2025), encompasses simultaneously more and less than the aspirations of the present volume.⁶ The emergence of this concept coincided with the onset of an international boom in memory and identity studies in the 1980s. In the subsequent period, the concept was initially pursued in several Western European countries from a national perspective, following the French editorial project.⁷ Concurrent with the emergence of the first projects that adopted a pan-European perspective,⁸ a body of literature focusing on Central and South-Eastern Europe also came to the fore during the first decade of the new millennium. The contributions in this volume adopt an approach similar to that of lieux de mémoire, focusing on the historical regions of Central, South-Eastern and Eastern Europe.⁹ A total of fifteen authors discuss, from an art-historical perspective, the processes of nationalisation and heroisation of urban space on the one hand, and overlooked and concealed topics on the other, using the example of twelve cities in nine countries. The visual transformation of space in different political systems and the complex intertwining of power and the political agenda of public monuments are given particular consideration, as are the respective art canons in perception and evaluation.

Although Robert Musil's famous, oft-quoted description of monuments characterises them as invisible,¹⁰ their role in space is always active and memory-binding,¹¹ which is why one of the important questions is how to deal with the in situ preservation and 5 Of particular interest are the exhibitions presented in Vienna and Munich during the decade following the fall of the Iron Curtain, and most notably the exhibition Art and Power: Europe under the Dictators 1930–45, which was shown in London, Barcelona and Berlin as part of the prominent Council of Europe Exhibitions. Cf. EXHIBIT.CAT. VIENNA 1994. – EXHIBIT.CAT. VIENNA/MUNICH 1994–1995. – EXHIBIT.CAT. LONDON/BARCELONA/BERLIN 1995–1996.

6 NORA 1984–1992; see also UNFRIED 1991.

7 An exemplary case study of this phenomenon is provided by the German editorial project: FRANÇOIS/SCHULZE 2001.

8 Cf. BOER/DUCHHARDT/KREIS/SCHMALE 2011–2012. – FRANÇOIS/SERRIER 2012.

9 WEBER/OLSCOWSKY/PETRANSKY/PÓK/PRZEWOŹNIK 2011. – BAHLCKE/ROHDEWALD/WÜNSCH 2013. – HAHN/TRABA/LOEW 2012–2015. An evaluation of the reception of the concept of lieux de mémoire in Eastern Europe is given in: GÓRNY/KOŃCZAL 2015.

10 MUSIL 1976.

11 For more see MUROVEC 2024.

musealisation of contested public monuments.¹² The toppling of monuments in the United States and elsewhere in the context of the Black Lives Matter movement is indicative of the differing attitudes towards monuments on a global scale.¹³ However, there has been far less media attention paid to the toppling of Soviet monuments in the Baltic states and Ukraine over the past decade and a half. These actions share clear parallels with the Black Lives Matter protests, both in their performative gesture and in their anti-colonial thrust.¹⁴

Numerous debates also highlight the ambition to right wrongs or make reparations, a concept that has recently been termed ‘memory activism’.¹⁵ Consequently, there is a desire to preserve the ‘true’ or just memory, and to prevent political populism from dominating public discourse. While such tones may be considered to be at odds with the fundamental task of the art historian, who researches and interprets the past as it was, in the domain of public monuments, it can be concluded that the objective is not necessarily to adopt a neutral ideological stance, but rather to explicitly situate research within a social context. Consequently, our research also reflects an awareness of art history’s involvement in the political system, both historically and in the present day. When studying cities as spaces of visual memory, researchers were guided by the realisation that art-historical research fundamentally contributes to the formation of visual and memory politics.

STRUCTURE OF THE VOLUME

The book explores the history of memorials and monuments, as well as shifting practices of remembrance and monument-related activities, in the following cities: Belgrade (Serbia), Berlin (Germany), Bitola (North Macedonia), Gori (Georgia), Krško (Slovenia), Kyiv (Ukraine), Nuremberg (Germany), Osijek (Croatia), Saint Petersburg (Russia), Ravne na Koroškem (Slovenia), Trieste (Italy), and Zagreb (Croatia). The essays encompass a range of geographical and political regions, including South-Eastern Europe, 12 Some Baltic states have made a political decision to completely remove Soviet monuments; cf. e.g. JÕEKALDA 2024. – KUYCK 2025.

13 For public monuments and the Black Lives Matter movement, see e.g.: SPIEGEL 2021. – BOLDRICK/CLAY/DUSTER/MAGEE 2022.

14 On developments in the Baltic States: DAVOLIŪTĖ 2023. – JÕEKALDA 2024. – KUYCK 2025. In Ukraine, the Euromaidan protests against the policies of the pro-Russian President Viktor Yanukovich, which began in December 2013, were accompanied by a widespread destruction of Lenin monuments. This phenomenon was referred to in a Ukrainian neologism, ‘Leninopad’ (Lenin fall). The removal of Soviet monuments, which were increasingly regarded as symbols of oppression by Moscow, accelerated in the aftermath of the 2015 decree on Decommunisation and ultimately in the wake of the 2022 full-scale invasion of the country by Russian troops. See PETERS 2016. – BETLIH 2022.

15 GUTMAN/WÜSTENBERG 2023.

Central Europe, the Alpine-Adriatic region, and Eastern Europe, which, to a certain extent, overlap due to the comprehensive coverage of a historical period spanning from the mid-nineteenth century to the present day. Memorials erected in the historical states of Austria-Hungary, Yugoslavia and the Soviet Union are situated in areas that have been embroiled in conflict since the 1990s, thus becoming particularly contested spaces, often referred to as 'dissonant heritage'. Certain studies focus on a single period or even a single monument, while others explore cities and their memorial landscapes over a larger span of time.

The first two articles offer detailed analyses of the evolution of perspectives on the Holocaust and its subsequent impact on visual memory politics in the cities of Trieste and Bitola. Until 1918, Trieste was part of the Habsburg Monarchy, and above all it was a cosmopolitan port where people from many different countries had met and connected for centuries. However, in the aftermath of the First World War, the city became a major centre of Fascism and violence against Slovenes. The primary function of Trieste's monuments has been to commemorate the establishment of the city as an Italian entity and the triumph of the Italian forces. However, this approach effectively erases the city's intricate historical tapestry, failing to differentiate between cause and effect in the process. Additionally, they serve to memorialise the violence perpetrated against Italians in Yugoslavia after the Second World War (foibe). Trieste is a highly pertinent case study for the investigation of contested memories and understanding how societies commemorate their violent pasts in public spaces and how borderlands can strengthen nationalism and the exclusion of 'the Other'. The landscape of memory is considerably less complex than is generally assumed. As part of the European HERA project, Transfer of Cultural Objects in the Alpe Adria Region in the 20th Century, Daria Brasca and Donata Levi conducted research into attitudes towards Jewish cultural heritage in the Italian part of the region, with a particular focus on the city of Trieste. In their joint text in this volume, the authors shed light on the violence against members of the Jewish community and the confiscation of their property from the perspective of memory politics in public spaces. Notably, public monuments in the city commemorating the Holocaust and Italian collaboration with the Nazis are scarce. The public remembrance of the Holocaust in Trieste has remained limited and fragmented. The majority of these initiatives were pioneered by Jewish institutions or associations, while official authorities only belatedly endorsed commemorative plaques, Stolpersteine, and ceremonies, often amidst disputes and ambiguities. The Risiera di San Sabba emerged as a central yet contested site, caught between Holocaust remembrance and nationalist and anti-Communist interpretations. Brasca and Levi illustrate how local, national and ideological tensions obstruct the development of a shared and critically engaged memory of the Holocaust, leaving it overshadowed by competing narratives and political instrumentalisation.

In a similar vein, the period following the Second World War in Yugoslavia provided minimal avenues for the commemoration of the fate of the Jews during the war. Conversely, a significant number of monuments were erected to primarily glorify the national liberation struggle of the partisans. Even the renowned Stone Flower (Croat. Kameni cvijet) monument in Jasenovac, designed by Bogdan Bogdanović (1922–2010) and unveiled in 1966 on the site of a concentration camp operated by the Independent State of Croatia (Nezavisna Država Hrvatska, NDH) during the war – where Serbs, Jews, and Roma were imprisoned and killed – was primarily regarded as a monument denouncing the occupiers and honouring the revolution rather than serving as a memorial of the Holocaust.¹⁶ The glorification of communist resistance in the post-war period was instrumental in the failure of Yugoslavia to commemorate the Holocaust. The article by Svetlana Smolčić Makuljević examines the once-vibrant Jewish community of Bitola (Manastir), a major Sephardic centre in the Balkans until the Holocaust, and the subsequent erasure of its cultural presence. This centuries-old community was extinguished during the Second World War, when more than 7,000 Jews from Bitola were deported to Treblinka by the Bulgarian occupiers. Their synagogues were destroyed or repurposed, and Jewish neighbourhoods disappeared from the urban landscape. The study by Smolčić Makuljević argues that post-war and post-communist memory politics contributed to this erasure. Within the context of Yugoslav socialism, the remembrance of the Holocaust was predominantly overshadowed by anti-Fascist narratives that focused exclusively on the commemoration of partisan heroes, largely ignoring the broader Jewish tragedy. Today, despite renewed interest and projects like the restoration of Bitola's Jewish cemetery, most sites of Jewish heritage remain unmarked, neglected or poorly preserved. Smolčić Makuljević shows that Bitola's urban landscape reflects a culture of oblivion rather than remembrance.

Two articles focus on Zagreb, the capital of Croatia. In the first study, Dragan Damjanović explores the monumental landscape of the nineteenth century, juxtaposing it with that of another Croatian city, Osijek. The monuments, which were created between the Austro-Hungarian Compromise and the end of the First World War, reflect political tensions, the emergence of national identity and cultural aspirations. While other cities within the Habsburg Monarchy (which later became part of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, and after 1929 the Kingdom of Yugoslavia) also experienced 'competitions' over which historical figures to commemorate – for example in Ljubljana between German- and Slovenian-speaking populations, as well as between conservative and liberal political factions – Zagreb's semi-autonomous position within Hungary makes it a unique case. While the pro-Hungarian government refrained from sponsoring monuments that could potentially incite Croatian nationalism, local authorities, opposition parties, cultural associations and private citizens – particularly in Zagreb – strategically utilised monuments to writers, artists and military heroes to forge a Croatian national pantheon. The Lower Town of Zagreb emerged as the symbolic centre of this 'Croatisation', while cemeteries such as Mirogoj functioned as sites for politically sensitive commemorations. In contrast, the ethnically diverse and politically loyal city of Osijek avoided national monuments, favouring 'neutral' or dynastic themes instead.

16 GIERGIEL/TACZYŃSKA 2024, 464–468.

A comprehensive transformation of the memorial landscape took place in the newly formed Yugoslavia after 1945. In addition to sites associated with partisan battles and Nazi violence, city centres, particularly in the republics and border towns, became focal points for the transformation and installation of new public monuments. The most ambitious of these projects endowed the country with a new memorial identity and involved the construction of new socialist districts or even entire cities, such as Nova Gorica on the border with Italy. In her paper, Patricia Počanić explores how public art shaped the identity and daily life of Novi Zagreb, a socialist-era extension of Croatia's capital, developed after the Second World War to address housing shortages. Počanić identifies three forms of public art: monuments, frequently modest war memorials associated with ideological narratives; sculptures, installed in residential areas to humanise 'concrete dormitories' and celebrate labour, youth and everyday life; and temporary artistic interventions, which emerged in the 1970s and 1980s through the New Artistic Practice to democratise art, engage local people and transform public space. Despite their ephemerality, these interventions embodied bottom-up urbanism and Henri Lefebvre's "right to the city", generating collective memories. Počanić evaluates Novi Zagreb's public art as a dynamic interplay between state-controlled cultural policy and grassroots tactics, in which art served as both a vehicle for ideology and a means of reclaiming everyday life.

Milan Popadić, an art historian primarily focused on monument protection, dedicates his essay to New Belgrade, which served as the capital of both the Republic of Serbia and the Socialist state of Yugoslavia until its dissolution in 1991. The author explores the transformation of Ušće, an area located at the confluence of the Sava and Danube rivers, as a case study of how cities embody memory and commemorative identity. Drawing on Alois Riegl's distinction between intentional and unintentional monuments and Ivo Maroević's tripartite model of material–form–meaning, Popadić situates Ušće within the broader discourse of urban memory. This theoretical framework posits the city as both a mnemonic mechanism and a heritage corpus, wherein its factual identity (its historical and social definition) interacts dynamically with its actual identity (its contemporary perception). Within this context, Ušće serves as a poignant example of the tension between urban form as a site of collective remembrance and as a stage for the evolution of political, social and cultural agendas. Historically, Ušće was a no-man's land at the border of empires. During the socialist era, it was radically redefined as a representational space of Yugoslav statehood. This was embodied by structures such as the Palace of the Federation, the Central Committee Tower, the Museum of Contemporary Art and the Friendship Park. In the post-socialist period, these landmarks have undergone processes of functional and symbolic redefinition, including commercialisation, reconstruction and ideological reframing. Today, Ušće functions as both a commercial hub and a cultural venue, yet the contested plans for its redevelopment highlight conflicting priorities between heritage preservation and neoliberal urban transformation.

The small Slovenian town of Krško, located near the Croatian border, is the final municipality under discussion that was part of Austria-Hungary in the nineteenth century and subsequently Yugoslavia following its dissolution. In their paper, authors Barbara Kristina Murovec and Helena Rožman adopt a longue durée approach in their examination of the town, considering the first public monuments from the late nineteenth century to the present day and drawing comparisons, particularly with the Slovenian capital, Ljubljana. The selection of Krško was not arbitrary; several momentous events in Slovenian history occurred in the surrounding area, including peasant uprisings, the advent of Protestantism, a camp that functioned as a key collection point for the deportation of Slovenes during the Second World War and the resettlement of the Gottscheer Germans from the part of Slovenia occupied by Italy. Nevertheless, numerous features of memorial policy are also relevant to other Slovenian cities. The authorities responsible for erecting monuments in socialist Yugoslavia redefined commemoration through monumental propaganda, celebrating the partisan struggle, reframing peasant revolts as precursors to the Communist revolution and selectively memorialising deportations while silencing post-war Communist violence. Krško's monuments reveal how the negotiation of remembrance and deliberate forgetting are manifested in public space, with each political era reshaping the past to suit its own narratives. Through a case study of Krško, the authors demonstrate that monuments are never neutral, but rather instruments for constructing and rewriting identity. At present, the town's monuments form a layered palimpsest, blending national propaganda, local pride and selective silences.

The following two articles focus on the German cities of Berlin and Nuremberg. In his essay, architectural historian Iain Boyd Whyte chronicles the tumultuous appellation history of a Berlin square, reflecting the fluctuating political ideologies of twentieth-century Germany. Initially constructed during Berlin's westward expansion and named Reichskanzlerplatz in honour of Otto von Bismarck (1815–1898), the square came to symbolise German imperial nation-building. During the Weimar era, the site became a showcase of modern urbanism, featuring broadcasting houses and exhibition halls. In the era of the National Socialists, the square underwent a renaming to Adolf-Hitler-Platz and was incorporated into Albert Speer's overambitious plans for Germania, which included the proposed renaming to Mussolini-Platz and the erection of a colossal militaristic monument by Arno Breker (1900–1991). Following the destruction during the Second World War, the square reverted to Reichskanzlerplatz before being renamed Theodor-Heuss-Platz in honour of West Germany's first president, who had been a critic of Nazism. Post-war memorials such as the Eternal Flame for the displaced Germans and the Blauer Obelisk were erected to monumentalise democratic values, albeit with less impact than earlier authoritarian symbols. Using the renaming and redesign of the square as an example, Whyte illustrates Berlin's ongoing battle between remembrance and forgetting, demonstrating how the appellations of streets and squares encode power, ideology and memory.

Due to its function in Nazi Germany, Nuremberg features numerous monuments that are perceived as 'difficult heritage', and preserving them poses significant challenges. However, in her essay, Anke Schlecht examines Nuremberg's two at first glance less controversial and most significant fountains, the fourteenth-century Schöner Brunnen and the seventeenth-century Neptune Fountain, as case studies to illustrate how monuments in public space acquire and lose meaning over time. These two fountains provide excellent examples of how public monuments, intended to be permanent symbols, become dynamic sites of change and discourse that are constantly reinterpreted according to political power, cultural values and public sentiments. Their visibility, controversy and even absence shape urban identity and memory. In Nuremberg, this shifting perception reveals how the city continues to grapple with its layered past, from imperial prestige and a medieval heritage to Nazi appropriation and contemporary efforts to redefine itself as a 'city of peace and human rights'. Following the submission of the article, various groups engaged actively in acts of civil disobedience by dyeing the water in public fountains in Nuremberg and other German cities, including Berlin, Hamburg, Gera, Kassel, Munich and Regensburg. The colour red was chosen to symbolise blood, black to represent oil, and green to denote either poison or greenwashing, depending on the focus of the protests, bringing climate change to the fore – a topic not covered in our book. During the summer of 2025, the water in the Neptune Fountain in Nuremberg was dyed a vibrant green. To date, no individual or group has acknowledged responsibility for the so-called 'paint attack', which is likely to diminish the impact of the protest. For a change in perception and awareness to occur, a clear explanation and strong stance are required.

The contribution of Tanja Zimmermann introduces a series of articles on Eastern Europe, combining an art-historical perspective on public space with an approach rooted in literary studies. Her case study centres on nineteenth century Saint Petersburg, a planned city founded by Peter the Great (1672–1725), which came to embody both a real and literary space. Writers and artists created 'city texts' that blended urban topography with myth and memory, thereby shaping the city's identity and its inhabitants' perception of it. As Zimmermann contends, the image of Saint Petersburg underwent a transition, evolving from an idealised 'paradise' to a contested, ambivalent urban symbol. Early feuilletons and panoramas fostered a participatory, kinetic urban culture that intertwined memory, national identity and consumerism. However, Zimmermann's essay, drawing on numerous literary and artistic examples, demonstrates that the meaning of the boulevard evolved over time to reflect the broader tensions between modernity, nationalism and urban life.

The following essay by Irene Giviashvili provides an insight into the complex cultural and political history of Georgia, shedding light on the role of the city of Gori during the Communist era and contemporary tensions. The city's architecture and urban development reflect Soviet totalitarian aesthetics and global memorial traditions. The Stalin Museum and memorial landscape are powerful yet contested heritage sites. This study explores how Joseph Stalin's cult of personality reshaped his hometown of Gori through architecture, urban planning and cultural memory. Beginning in the 1930s, the humble birthplace of the dictator underwent a transformation into a monumental shrine, reminiscent of international memorial sites such as Lincoln's birthplace in Kentucky. New avenues, hotels and public spaces were constructed to support Gori as a pilgrimage site, culminating in the Stalin State Museum (1957), which was designed to incorporate both Stalinist imperial grandeur and medieval Georgian forms. Presently, the Stalin Museum remains a preserved 'time capsule' of Soviet propaganda, thus giving rise to complex questions concerning the manner in which societies address contested heritage. Despite the removal of Stalin's statue in 2010 and the introduction of exhibits on Soviet repression, the museum still reflects the tension between preserving authentic Soviet-era narratives and preventing their misuse for glorification purposes. Gori's transformation is illustrative of the strategies employed by totalitarian regimes to utilise urban design for the glorification of political leaders, and the longevity of such legacies within contemporary landscapes.

The concluding three chapters of the publication analyse the relationship between cities and visual memory politics in Slovenia, Serbia and Ukraine, with a particular focus on individual monuments. This dynamic is examined within the broader frameworks of Otherness, the populist reshaping of memory through new autocratic commissions and in response to ongoing military conflicts. The Italian art historian Giovanni Rubino examines Dino Basaldella's Ear of Ravne, created at the Forma Viva Symposium in the Slovenian town of Ravne na Koroškem in 1965. The monument is both a landmark of abstract-expressionist iron sculpture and a politically charged work of public art. Rubino proposes a dual interpretation of the sculpture, emphasising its aesthetic and political dimensions. From an aesthetic perspective, it is regarded as one of the final notable examples of welded scrap-iron sculpture in Europe. Politically, it is seen as a symbol of the cultural collaboration between Italy and Yugoslavia during the Cold War, representing the integration of art with the dignity of labour. The Ear of Ravne thus stands as a unique convergence of modernist form, industrial material and socialist ideology, transforming public sculpture into a tribute to labour and collective identity. Notably, the state narratives of remembrance along the Italian eastern border and the Slovenian western border were vastly different, bearing the scars of fascist violence against the Yugoslav population and the Yugoslav authorities' subsequent attitude towards the Italian population.

In his analysis of a monument erected in Belgrade a decade ago, Nenad Makuljević addressed the highly relevant issue of how public spaces are used to engender visual politics in the twenty-first century. Specifically, he asserts that the monument to Stefan Nemanja in Belgrade exemplifies the manner in which the autocratic government of Aleksandar Vučić reconfigures urban identity through the utilisation of monuments as instruments of political propaganda. The project, initiated in 2015 under Vučić's direct guidance, circumvented transparent procedures, relied on a politicised selection process and ultimately entrusted the work to Russian sculptor Alexander Rukavishnikov, thereby underscoring both domestic authoritarian control and Serbia's alignment with Russia. The monument itself departs from the traditional religious veneration of Nemanja, with its oversized dimensions, militaristic symbolism and ambiguous iconography constructing a new, politicised cult around him as a national-historical figure. Although it is presented as a revival of Serbian identity, it is actually a populist spectacle: megalomaniacal in scale, opaque in financing and manipulative in meaning. Rather than honouring history, the monument exemplifies how an autocratic regime can use public space to consolidate power and project nationalist fantasies. Serbian monumental politics employs the same approaches as Yugoslavia did after 1945, when it monumentalised the entire country with memorials dedicated to the national liberation struggle, which determined the manner of remembrance for decades to come. Since monuments serve as instruments of the regime, they function not only as conduits for remembrance and forgetting, but also possess the capacity to influence the process of (re)shaping the identity of the population and the landscape.

This agency of monuments also directs the reading of memorials in the article by Dirk Suckow, the final contribution in the book. Suckow examines the history and transformation of Kyiv's Peoples' Friendship Monument. Inaugurated in 1982, it was intended as a Soviet celebration of the 'eternal unity' of Russia and Ukraine, visually expressed through a giant titanium rainbow arch and accompanying sculptures. Conceived as a propaganda project, the monument embodied the Soviet myth of 'peoples' friendship', interweaving the 1654 Treaty of Pereyaslav with narratives of socialist brotherhood, unity and progress. Due to its central location and monumental scale, the monument became a powerful urban and ideological landmark, thus embedding imperial narratives into Kyiv's cityscape. Since Ukraine gained independence in 1991, however, the monument has been subject to continuous reinterpretation and dismantlement. Initially trivialised through everyday leisure activities and activist interventions, the site became a contested location during the Euromaidan protests and following Russia's aggression in 2014. In the aftermath of the full-scale invasion by Russia in 2022, the ‘reunification’ sculptures were removed, and the ensemble was officially renamed the ‘Arch of Freedom of the Ukrainian People’. In the contemporary context, it is being reintegrated into a new commemorative project that pays tribute to Ukraine’s defenders. Suckow argues that the monument exemplifies how Soviet symbols can be re-coded to represent anti-imperial memory, shifting from an emblem of enforced unity to one of Ukrainian freedom and resilience.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The book emerged from a lengthy and specific process. The editors have continued and transformed an initial book project conceived as a collection of papers from an international conference held in Nova Gorica in November 2018, entitled (Past) Visions of the Future and the Materialisation of Memory in Public Space: Nova Gorica – A Town Built on the Border after the Second World War in Comparative Perspective. While some of the texts in the volume relate to this event, others were added later, with the final article being included in 2025. The book is being published under the auspices of a renowned series Das östliche Europa: Kunst- und Kulturgeschichte and with generous funding support of the Zentralinstitut für Kunstgeschichte in Munich, where Wolfgang Augustyn joined the editorial team. We are especially grateful to him for this.

First and foremost, however, we would like to express our gratitude to the authors of the initial project for their patience in waiting for the book to take its final form. Simultaneously, we would like to extend our deepest appreciation to the authors who joined the project later and enriched the volume with their expertise. Finally, we would like to express our gratitude to the peer reviewers and the co-editor of the series Das östliche Europa, Ada Raev, for their meticulous review of the contributions, and to the team at Böhlau Verlag, particularly Julia Beenken, Kristi Doepner and Bettina Waringer, as well as the proofreader Kate Bird. On occasion, book projects represent a special turning point or caesura. This is also true of the present publication, which began in a completely different world and within a different framework of collaborations to that in which it ends. While the present volume is not designed to address the global challenges that are currently being faced, it seeks to facilitate a more profound and nuanced comprehension of the subject matter.¹⁷

¹⁷ The part of the introduction written by Barbara Kristina Murovec and her part of final editing were also supported through a fellowship at the Käte Hamburger Centre for Cultural Practices of Reparation (CURE) by the German Federal Ministry of Research, Technology and Space (BMFTR) under funding code 01UK2401.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- ASSMANN, Aleida: Erinnerungsräume. Formen und Wandlungen des kulturellen Gedächtnisses. München 1999.
- BAHLCKE, Joachim/ROHDEWALD, Stefan/WÜNSCH, Thomas (eds.): Religiöse Erinnerungsorte in Ostmitteleuropa. Konstitution und Konkurrenz im nationen- und epochenübergreifenden Zugriff. Berlin 2013.
- BETLIJ, Olena: The Identity Politics of Heritage. Decommunization, Decolonization, and Derussification of Kyiv Monuments after Russia's Full-Scale Invasion of Ukraine. In: Journal of Applied History 4/1–2 (2022), 149–169. DOI:10.1163/25895893-bja10031 [last accessed 20.10.2025].
- BOER, Pim den/DUCHHARDT, Heinz/KREIS, Georg/SCHMALE, Wolfgang (eds.): Europäische Erinnerungsorte. Vols. 1–3. Munich 2011–2012.
- BOLDRICK, Stacy/CLAY, Richard/DUSTER, Michelle/MAGEE, Keith: Remembering and Forgetting Confederate Monuments. Taking the Bitter with the Sweet. In: Sculpture Journal 31/1 (2022), 9–22.
- BOWLT, John E.: Russian Sculpture and Lenin's Plan of Monumental Propaganda. In: MILLON/NOCHLIN 1978, 182–193.
- DAVOLIŪTĖ, Violeta: Lithuania's Postcolonial Iconoclasm – or Politics by Other Means. In: Cultures of History Forum (30.09.2023). DOI: 10.25626/0148 [last accessed 20.10.2025].
- DRENGENBERG, Hans-Jürgen: Die sowjetische Politik auf dem Gebiet der bildenden Kunst von 1917 bis 1934. Diss. Freie Universität Berlin 1969. Berlin 1972 (Forschungen zur ost-europäischen Geschichte 16; Osteuropa-Institut an der Freien Universität Berlin. Historische Veröffentlichungen).
- ECKARDT, Frank: Stadtforschung. Gegenstand und Methoden. Wiesbaden 2014.
- EXHIBIT.CAT. VIENNA/MUNICH 1994–1995: Tyrannie des Schönen. Architektur der Stalin-Zeit. Vienna, Österreichisches Museum für Angewandte Kunst, 06.04.–17.07.1994; Munich, Museum Villa Stuck, 11.05.–09.07.1995. Ed. Peter NOEVER. München 1994.
- EXHIBIT.CAT. VIENNA 1994: Kunst und Diktatur: Architektur, Bildhauerei und Malerei in Österreich, Deutschland, Italien und der Sowjetunion 1922–1956. Vienna, Gesellschaft Bildender Künstler Österreichs, Künstlerhaus, 28.03.–15.08.1994. Ed. Jan TABOR. Vols. 1–2. Baden 1994.
- EXHIBIT.CAT. LONDON/BARCELONA/BERLIN 1995–1996: Art and Power. Europe under the Dictators 1930–45. London, Hayward Gallery, 26.10.1995–21.10.1996; Barcelona, Centro de Cultura Contemporània de Barcelona, 26.02.–05.05.1996; Berlin, Deutsches Historisches Museum, 11.06.–20.08.1996. Ed. Dawn ADES. London 1995 (Council of Europe Exhibitions 23).
- FRANÇOIS, Étienne/SCHULZE, Hagen (eds.): Deutsche Erinnerungsorte. Vols. 1–3. München 2001.
- FRANÇOIS, Étienne/SERRIER, Thomas: Lieux de mémoire européens. Paris 2012 (La documentation photographique).

- FRISÉ, Adolf (ed.): Robert Musil. Gesammelte Werke in neun Bänden. 7. Kleine Prosa, Aphorismen, Autobiographisches. Reinbek bei Hamburg 1978.
- GAMBONI, Dario: The Destruction of Art. Iconoclasm and Vandalism since the French Revolution. New edition. London 2018 [1997].
- GIERGIEL, Sabina/TACZYŃSKA, Katarzyna: Reframing Difficult Heritage? The Holocaust Monuments in Croatia. In: Heritage & Society 17/3 (2024), 461–478.
- GÓRNY, Maciej/KOŃCZAL, Kornelia: The (Non-)Travelling Concept of Les Lieux de Mémoire: Central and Eastern European Perspectives. In: PAKIER/WAWRZYŃIAK 2015, 59–76.
- GUTMAN, Yifat/WÜSTENBERG, Jenny (eds.): The Routledge Handbook of Memory Activism. London/New York 2023.
- HAHN, Hans Henning/TRABA, Robert/LOEW, Peter Oliver (eds.): Deutsch-Polnische Erinnerungsorte. Vols. 1–5. Paderborn 2012–2015.
- HEROLD, Stephanie/VINKEN, Gerhard (eds.): Denkmal_Emotion. Politisierung – Mobilisierung – Bindung. Holzminden 2021. <https://doi.org/10.11588/arthistoricum.920.c13261> [last accessed 20.10.2025], 76–81.
- HIMID, Lubaina: Thinking Again about Monuments in 2022. In: The Sculpture Journal 31/3 (2022), 361–366.
- JÓEKALDA, Kristina (ed.): Kunsttexte.de 1/2024. Ostblick, Special Issue: War on Monuments. Documenting the Debates over Russian and Soviet Heritage in Eastern and Central Europe. DOI: <https://doi.org/10.48633/ksttx.2024.1> [last accessed 20.10.2025].
- KOGLER, Raphaela/HAMEDINGER, Alexander (eds.): Interdisziplinäre Stadtforschung I. Themen und Perspektiven. Bielefeld 2021 (Urban Studies).
- KOGLER, Raphaela/HAMEDINGER, Alexander (eds.): Interdisziplinäre Stadtforschung II. Zugänge und Methoden. Bielefeld 2024 (Urban Studies).
- KUYCK, Kristina van: Baltic States Have Torn Down Their Soviet Past Following Ukraine War. A Photo Essay. In: The Conversation. Academic Rigour, Journalistic Flair, 2 September 2025. <https://theconversation.com/baltic-states-have-torn-down-their-soviet-past-following-ukraine-war-a-photo-essay-263468> [last accessed 20.10.2025].
- McHUTCHION, Benjamin: Colonial Statues as Memorial Contact Zones. Macdonald, Cornwallis and Statue Removal in Canada. In: The Sculpture Journal 31/1 (2022), 55–74.
- MIEG, Harald A./HEYL, Christoph (eds.): Stadt. Ein interdisziplinäres Handbuch. Stuttgart/Weimar 2013.
- MILLON, Henry A./NOCHLIN, Linda (eds.): Art and Architecture in the Service of Politics. Cambridge, Mass. 1978.
- MITTIG, Hans-Ernst/PLAGEMANN, Volker (eds.): Denkmäler im 19. Jahrhundert. Deutung und Kritik. München 1972 (Studien zur Kunst des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts 20).
- MUROVEC, Barbara Kristina: Transformations of Public Space. Art, Heritage and Memorial Politics in the (Former) Yugoslavia and Italy. In: International Journal of Arts and

- Media Researches 14/4 (2024), 246–262. https://artsmediajournal.tafu.edu.ge/wp-content/uploads/2024/09/N14_artstud_007_Barbara-Murovec.pdf [last accessed 20.10.2025].
- MUSIL, Robert: Denkmale [10. Dezember 1927]. In: FRISÉ 1978, 604–608.
- NERDINGER, Winfried (ed.): Stadt und Erinnerung. Auseinandersetzung mit dem Nationalsozialismus in Berlin, Hamburg und München. München 2017 (Schriftenreihe NS-Dokumentationszentrum München).
- NORA, Pierre (ed.): Les Lieux de mémoire. Vols. 1–3. Paris 1984–1992.
- PAKIER, Małgorzata/WAWRZYŃIAK, Joanna (eds.): Memory and Change in Europe. Eastern Perspectives. New York/Oxford 2015 (Studies in Contemporary European History 16).
- PETERS, Florian: Roter Mohn statt Rotem Stern. “Entkommunisierung” der Geschichtskultur in der Ukraine. In: Osteuropa 66/3 (2016), 59–77.
- RAUSCH, Helke: Kultfigur und Nation. Öffentliche Denkmäler in Paris, Berlin und London 1848–1914. Diss. Heidelberg 2002. München 2006 (Pariser historische Studien 70).
- ROTHBERG, Michael: Multidirectional Memory. Remembering the Holocaust in the Age of Decolonization. Stanford, Cal. 2009.
- SAUNDERS, Anna: Memorializing the GDR. Monuments and Memory after 1989. New York/Oxford 2018.
- SPEITKAMP, Winfried (ed.): Denkmalsturz. Zur Konfliktgeschichte politischer Symbolik. Göttingen 1997.
- SPIEGEL, Daniela: Volkszorn und Denkmalstürze. Überlegungen im Kontext der Black-Lives-Matter-Bewegung im Jahr 2020. In: HEROLD/VINKEN 2021, 76–81.
- THAMER, Hans-Ulrich: Von der Monumentalisierung zur Verdrängung der Geschichte. Nationalsozialistische Denkmalpolitik und die Entnazifizierung von Denkmälern nach 1945. In: SPEITKAMP 1997, 91–136.
- UNFRIED, Berthold: Gedächtnis und Geschichte. Pierre Nora und die lieux de mémoire. In: Österreichische Zeitschrift für Geschichtswissenschaften 2/4 (1991): Orte der Erinnerung, 79–99.
- WEBER, Matthias/OLSCHOWSKY, Burkhard/PETRANSKÝ, Ivan/PÓK, Attila/PRZEWOŹNIK, Andrzej (eds.): Erinnerungsorte in Ostmitteleuropa. Erfahrungen der Vergangenheit und Perspektiven. München 2011 (Schriften des Bundesinstituts für Kultur und Geschichte der Deutschen im östlichen Europa 42 / Schriften des Europäischen Netzwerks Erinnerung und Solidarität 1).
- YOUNG, James: The Counter-Monument. Memory against Itself in Germany Today. In: Critical Inquiry 18/2 (1992), 267–296.

Conflicting Memories in Trieste

The Case of the Holocaust Memorials¹

INTRODUCTION

On the San Giusto Hill, in the heart of Trieste's historic centre, a Park of Memory (Parco della Rimembranza) is dedicated to the memory of the numerous soldiers and civilians who fell in the twentieth century's wars. Towering over the park is a mighty monument to the fallen of the First World War, consisting of a cast-iron sculptural group of five classical warriors by Attilio Selva (1888–1970), inaugurated in 1935 to commemorate the fallen of the 'War of Liberation' against Austria. Near it, an imposing inscription on white karst stone slabs tells: "Roma è qui, è qui sul vostro colle e sul vostro mare / è qui nei secoli che furono e in quelli che saranno / qui con le sue leggi con le sue armi e con il suo re" ("Rome is here, it is here on your hill and on your sea / has been here in past centuries and will remain here in the future / here, with its laws with its arms and with its king") (Fig. 1).² This is the last sentence of the speech, which Benito Mussolini (1883–1945) delivered in Trieste on 18 September 1938, he announced the promulgating of the Italian Racial Laws (Regio decreto legge no. 1728, which was issued on 17 November 1938). The author of the speech and therefore the historical context, has been concealed: Below the inscription on the right, a small slab with the initial M [Mussolini] was erased, presumably after the end of the Second World War. Nevertheless, the Fascist cult of Romanità and imperial aspirations, explicitly conflated with Italian Racial Laws in Mussolini's 1938 speech, continue to play an important role and occupy a central place in the public space dedicated to Trieste's collective memory of the war-related events of the twentieth century. The survival of the inscription to the present day and, at the same time, the fact that it has been deliberately neutralised are emblematic of Trieste's difficult relationship with its Fascist and antisemitic past.

1 This paper is the result of joint research and writing, with both authors collaborating fully, but for Italian academic purposes: Daria Brasca is author of the paragraphs: The Refusal of Dealing with the Past Between Mystification and Oblivion; Holocaust Memories in Trieste. Donata Levi is author of the paragraphs: Jews in Trieste. From Integration to Persecution; Conflicting Memories; A Controversial and Unresolved Past.

2 KNITTEL 2014, 212–216; https://www.irsml.eu/Parco_San_Giusto/Parco_Rimembranza.pdf; <https://www.atrieste.eu/Forum3/viewtopic.php?t=1480&start=160> [last accessed 20.06.2022].

Fig. 1 Inscription with the last sentence of Mussolini's speech announcing the promulgation of the Italian Racial Laws in Trieste on 18 September 1938, San Giusto Hill, Trieste (© www.atrieste.eu, CC-BY-NC-ND).

JEW IN TRIESTE: FROM INTEGRATION TO PERSECUTION

More than eighty years have passed since Benito Mussolini proclaimed the Racial Laws in front of a cheering crowd gathered in the Piazza Unità d'Italia, the main square in Trieste.³ Mussolini's announcement came as no surprise to Italian Jews, as they had encountered the increasing anti-Semitic propaganda across the entire country. On 14 July 1938, a group of "Fascist scholars, professors at Italian universities",⁴ who drew inspiration from Mussolini, published the Manifesto on Race (Manifesto della razza) in the national newspaper Il Giornale d'Italia: it put forward the theory that Italians belonged to a superior race, excluding Jews.⁵ In the same summer of 1938, the Bureau for the Study of the Race Problem (Ufficio studi del problema della razza) was established within the Ministry of Popular Culture, while the Central Demographic Office of the Ministry of the Interior

3 SUSMEL/SUSMEL 1959, 144–147; <https://youtu.be/IsoQdrnKDK4?si=IX7RvljyudskPBXI>; <https://www.archivioluca.com/il-discorso-di-trieste/> [last accessed 13.04.2026].

4 LA DIFESA 1938, 2: "gruppo di studiosi fascisti, docenti nelle università italiane".

5 SARFATTI 1994. – SARFATTI 2000. – COLLOTTI 2008.

was transformed into the General Directorate for Demography and Race (better known as Demorazza). The initial anti-Semitic measure implemented by the Demorazza (to be understood as a prerequisite for proper legislation), consisted of the 'Jewish census', which commenced on 22 August 1938 with the purpose of tallying and documenting the Jewish population residing in Italy. In Trieste, the census registered 6,215 Jews, the highest population share in Italy.⁶

The city was home to a thriving, long-standing and prosperous Jewish community in which Judaism held a prominent position. In fact, it was the third largest in Italy in terms of numbers, and possessed the uniqueness of being seamlessly integrated into local society through its management of city administration and the economy.⁷ This integration was based on a general religious tolerance inaugurated by the privileges (religious freedom, ownership of real property and "unrestricted exercise of the arts, crafts, and trades") exceptionally granted to the Trieste Jewish community in 1771 by the Habsburg Empress Maria Theresa (1717–1780),⁸ and enhanced by the common identity of economic, cultural, social and political interests established in the middle and upper classes. The most important industrial and land assets of the Italian Northeast were successfully run by Jewish entrepreneurs belonging to powerful Jewish families of Trieste (such as Brunner, Stock, Pollitzer, etc.). Enrico Paolo Salem (1884–1948), the Municipality mayor from 1933 to 1938, belonged to the Jewish community.⁹ From the end of the nineteenth century until 1943, the port of Trieste played a significant role as one of the most important 'gateways' to Palestine, from where hundreds of thousands of Jews from Central and Eastern Europe embarked, in what can be described as an exodus seeking refuge from persecution. In addition, the city was an important headquarters for Zionist activities from 1918 onwards.¹⁰

Thus, the selection of Trieste to announce the racist legislation was not accidental. It was dictated by a strong symbolic charge that the anti-Semitic Fascist propaganda wanted to exploit. Trieste was important not only because of the presence of a stable Jewish population, but also because of the strong nationalist aspirations that prevailed there. Mussolini's speech in Piazza Unità d'Italia was one of the stops on a tour of the sites of the First World War between 18 and 26 September 1938. The trip, organised with great propaganda clamour and coverage, had strong Fascist and nationalist intentions. In 6 SARFATTI 2014, 347.

7 In 1906, 16 per cent of the city council was composed of Jews (MILLO 1989, 66–67). – CUSIN/DE FILIPPO 1991.

8 Regarding the complex issue of Habsburg policy in Jewish matters, cf. DUBIN 1999. – CATALAN 2000.

9 BON 1972, 31–42. – BON 2009.

10 HAMETZ 2002, 378–379: "[...] by 1918 the city was recognized as a headquarters for Zionist activity, a centre for the publication of Zionist literature, and a departure point for immigration to Palestine". – HAMETZ 2007. – BRASCA 2022.

Trieste the diffusion of nationalistic ideals was particularly strong, stemming from the old irredentist spirit that had been nurtured in the city before its annexation to Italy. Many Jews of Trieste had been fervent irredentists, and after the First World War, this made it easier to join the Fascist party, in a climate featuring frustration for the only partial fulfilment of war-time promises (the so-called ‘mutilated victory’).¹¹ The movement was stronger in Trieste than elsewhere in Italy, where, however, many Jews embraced Fascism as the natural outcome of nationalistic feelings.¹² The biographies of Trieste Jewish leaders of the liberal-national movement, such as Teodoro Mayer (1860–1942), founder and director of the daily national newspaper Il Piccolo, Salvatore Segrè Sartorio (1859–1949), entrepreneur and politician, Enrico Paolo Salem, and the lawyer Camillo Ara (1876–1944), President of the Institute for the Industrial Reconstruction (IRI), show clearly how involvement in the irredentist struggle resulted in early joining the Fascist ideology.¹³

The idea of a shared cultural identity emerged with the irredentist spirit and eventually evolved into nationalism, which gained strength in Trieste in the face of the conflicting relations with the Slavic world. Their roots can be traced back to the second half of the nineteenth century and gained momentum under the influence of the Fascist ideology.¹⁴

For these reasons, as well as the leading role of Jews in trade and finance, the impact of the 1938 Racial Laws was particularly severe in Trieste, fostering opportunistic behaviour and anti-Semitic violence, culminating in several attacks on members and institutions of the Jewish community.¹⁵ This social and economic disruption marked the prelude to the deportations and subsequent annihilation of Jewish people after 8 September 1943, when Trieste became the central hub of the Operationszone Adriatisches Küstenland of the Third Reich.¹⁶ The persecution of the Jews was brutal and systematic, more severe than in other parts of Italy. Jewish people who had not fled in time were arrested and 11 Cf. PERISSINOTTO 2018.

12 APIH 1988, 118–121. – CATALAN 1997; I percorsi dell'Irredentismo e della Grande Guerra https://www.irsrecfvg.eu/percorso_irredentismo/ [last accessed 20.06.2022]. From the beginning of the nineteenth century several Jewish leaders of the liberal-national movement (for example Mayer, the industrialists Ettore Modiano, Camillo Ara and Salvatore Segrè Sartorio) left the Jewish communities only for the political purpose that did not mean the disavowal of one's origins and traditions. It was a choice linked to militancy and the will to affirm a single faith in secular and liberal Italy.

13 MILLO 1989, 55–74, 223–255, 275–299. – REVELANT 2001. – MOEHRLE 2017. – SABATTI 2021; <http://www.atlantegrandeguerra.it/portfolio/camillo-ara> [last accessed 20.06.2022].

14 SLUGA 2003, 171–202. – CATALAN 2003, 35–39. – VINCI 2003, 40–44.

15 BON 2000, 127–151, 209–233; see also the virtual exhibition by Daria BRASCA and Donata LEVI: Judaica Alpe Adria. Traces of Jewish Memories. Synagogues and Judaica in the Julian March during the 20th Century. <https://judaica.dolmenweb.net/en/159/trieste> [last accessed 20.06.2022].

16 OSTI GUERRAZZI 2020, 260–273.

deported.¹⁷ The Trieste Jewish community experienced a devastating blow: out of its members, 668 “did not return”.¹⁸

Two features set apart persecutions against Jews in Trieste as notably harsh. The first is the high number of collaborators, detractors and spies and the involvement – as in many other Italian cities – of the Fascist paramilitary corps in the deportation of the Jews.¹⁹ A significant amount of documentation, used only to a limited extent in post-war trials of Nazi officers and Fascist collaborationists, confirms the extent of the persecution of the Jews of Trieste and the massive looting of their property.²⁰ Countless detractors and common citizens reported to the Nazi authorities where Jews sheltered, and profiteers took advantage of the confiscated assets, putting them up for sale. The second aspect is the location in Trieste of the only extermination camp in Italy, the Risiera di San Sabba. Its main purpose was to function as a transit camp for Jews facing deportation to Auschwitz, Dachau and Mauthausen, but the Risiera also became the site of mass killings and burning of the bodies of thousands of partisans, anti-Fascists and Slavic people.²¹

THE REFUSAL TO DEAL WITH THE PAST BETWEEN MYSTIFICATION AND OBLIVION

The trauma of the Holocaust has never been adequately addressed or cured, as a comprehensive coming to terms with it would have necessitated an engagement with the Fascist past and the acknowledgement of complicity and guilt of all the groups that played a role, whether passively or actively, in facilitating the Holocaust. The extensive and detailed documentation of the activities and robberies of the collaborators may even have been deliberately overlooked in the process of coming to terms with the history

17 COSLOVICH 1994, 360; <https://www.cdec.it/formazione/percorsi/per-la-storia-della-shoah/statistica-generale-degli-ebrei-vittime-della-shoah-in-italia-1943-1945/> [last accessed 20.06.2022]. According to the data collected by the Centro Documentazione Ebraica Contemporanea (Centre for Jewish Contemporary Documentation – CDEC), the number of deported Italian Jews was 6,806, plus 322 who were arrested and died in Italy. The provenance of 585 of the 6,806 is not known. 554 came from the province of Trieste, the highest number after Rome (1,694) and almost the double that of Milan (300). With regard to the place of internment, however, the same source confirms that 1,196 Jews were arrested and detained in the Risiera before being deported.

18 This is the expression used by the Community itself in the title of a six-page list printed after the war: “Iscritti alla Comunità Israelitica di Trieste deportati negli anni 1943–1945 e che non hanno fatto ritorno” (Registered Members of the Jewish Community of Trieste deported in 1943–1945 and who did not return); see SARFATTI 1988.

19 SLUGA 1996, esp. 408–409. – FRANZINELLI 2012, 173–177.

20 VETTER/BELCI 1976. – VETTER 1977, 165–181. – BRASCA 2017. – BOLZON/VERARDO 2019.

21 BON 2000, 318–321.